IN BRIEF

Some houses you visit. Others, you feel from the very first moment. Here, it begins with the approach through the countryside, until your eyes settle on this thatched Norman longhouse, gently elevated, almost set apart from the world. Naturally, your steps lead you toward the terrace. And that's where everything changes.

DESCRIPTION

The view opens wide over the Bresle valley. Nothing truly interrupts the horizon. Seasons drift by, the light shifts, and every moment of the day becomes an invitation to pause: a morning coffee, a long, lingering lunch, a quiet drink at sunset. This is, without question, the true heart of the home.

Inside, authenticity remains untouched. Exposed beams structure the space, fireplaces tell stories of past winters, and each room carries that simple, honest charm of traditional Norman houses. Dining room, living room with wood-burning stove, fitted kitchen—everything is in place, functional and warm, without excess.

Two bedrooms, a shower room, and well-organized spaces complete this first living area, already perfectly comfortable as it stands.

And then, there is the second part.

A more contemporary volume, with generous ceiling height, a mezzanine, and above all... its own separate entrance. Currently arranged as a living space with its distinctive red sofa, it could easily evolve into something else. A gîte, a guesthouse, a workspace for an independent activity—the potential is immediate, without the need for major transformation. The idea of additional income or a fully self-contained space makes perfect sense here. Upstairs, a comfortable bedroom extends this area, with further potential through the adjoining attic, offering the possibility to create a larger suite or an additional room.

Outside, the enclosed 1,289 m<sup>2</sup> plot surrounds the house naturally, without constraint. A working well for irrigation, an outbuilding for storage or projects, and even a robotic mower quietly maintaining the lawn while you...
